A neo-noir, suspense/drama, Martingale utilizes lots of shadow, disguising our characters and sometimes obscuring their emotions. They will often blend in to the backgrounds, allowing the mise-en-scène to take on a character of its own.
CINEMATOGRAPHY

Cinematographers like Igor Martinovic (Wormwood, House Of Cards), Robert Elswit (Nightcrawler, all Paul Thomas Anderson’s movies) and Jeff Cronenweth (The Girl With The Dragon Tattoo, most of David Fincher’s movies) provide much of the inspiration for Martingale in style and approach. The lighting is usually low-key and authentic and the framing is traditional.
Danni knows what failure feels like. Her marriage, her career, her ability to obey the law: they’ve all gone out the window at one point. Unfortunately though, the idea of also failing as a mother has stuck with her for the last two years. But her desperation to make things right, at least in her eyes, stays firm, even if it means taking irrational measures to see it through.
OTHER CHARACTERS

Whit

Danni’s pseudo-boyfriend and principle enabler, he’s young enough to still hold his ambitions dear but old enough to sample some of the hardships a person in lower-middle America has to dole out. His biggest flaw: part of him still thinks he’s 21 and invincible. He refuses to accept any relationship as permanent. Worse even, he steals from their employer, justifying to Danni why it’s ok for people like them. However he’s one of the few people who still sees the rabid benevolence in Danni and understands why it’s important not to ignore it, even if he doesn’t always agree with the methods which she shows it. He’s an anti-hero with a duplicitous undertone like Ben Foster or Dan Stevens.

Harland

At first glance, Harland might be considered a well-to-do retiree just living off a handsome pension. That might be true if he had worked a single honest day in his life. He’s one of the most personable crooks you’ll ever meet but only because he’s desperately concealing a heinous repertoire. He enjoys the good life all too much and won’t let anyone ruin that, even a charming woman like Danni, who’s remarkably been able to burrow through Harland’s leathery exterior. Think Jeffrey Dean Morgan or Michael Biehn.

Élan

Élan is the Yin to the rest of the character’s Yang. A Pacific-Northwestern Native American, he’s cut from the same cloth as every small-town, empathetic lawman who’s made a career from a moral viewpoint. Now if he could just get his ex-wife, Danni, out of his life, he’d be a happier person. But he can’t, so he continues to chase her around like a puppy, soliciting unwanted help and turning the other cheek when suspecting fishy activity. Actors like Gil Birmingham or Lou Diamond Phillips would be a perfect fit.

Robbie

As Harland’s only son and 20-year-old ne’er-do-well, he didn’t stand a chance being placed on this family tree. A thug with a million-dollar roof over his head who loves playing the role more than anything else, Robbie finds Danni at her most desperate time and takes advantage of it: there’s a noticeable pattern there and proves that the apple doesn’t fall too far from the tree. Young actors like Nick Robinson or Harry Styles.
